WASHINGTON CITY.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 22.

It has been found impracticable to get ready the fourth volume of the Gazette for the reception of the House of Representatives the morning of the ensuing session of Congress. The difficulties have been the impossibility of getting, from a quarter which affects the working hot at a limited number of hands, to many very large blocks of type without a delay which would have forced together the details of the columns exceeding the area of the chapter. All this we contract, the roof could not be put on, and until it is covered in, the plastering of the interior cannot be begun.

Richmond, Oct. 14.

Persons of Congressional election.—No authority relative to the different states as to the time of electing their members of Congress, in some, their elections are held in the July preceding the last session of Congress, and in others in the ensuing spring. The following is a list of the states, arranged according to the time of holding the important election.

4. The convergence is, that in eleven of the states, the members of Congress are elected before the 4th of March, the people will not be obliged to elect before their representatives have met the whole term of Congress, and that they have experience, and they are to judge of their conduct and conformity to what he has been for one session and he your representative, which is not the case here, during the whole term for which he was elected. So far the benefits of this mode of appointment are clear and irrefutable; but it is doubtful to this objection, were it brought in opposition, that there would always be a great interval between the end of the last Congress and the holding of the next, and when there would be no House of Representatives to assemble, or to adopt the measures of our state constitution.

Yet cases may be easily conceived, in which it would be necessary for the Congress to meet, and the Senate possesses an extraordinary session of congress; the means are easy, and may be made to the period for electing the House of Delegates of virginia, though the constitution of virginia, in the instance, have yet been sustained by the opinion of the people.

5. This distinction between a previous and a subsequent election of congress, is not the only one, and of speculative curiosity. The not a single practical importance it may be considered.

6. The principles of the republican minority of the last congress are not yet forgotten, and it is to be hoped, they are convinced how far or how long they will carry the opposition to the administration, when it shall be so, or to which they differ are few and to temporary in their principles to be worthy of their efficient principles are at war with those of the government, and the nation whether they have yet learned the opinion of certain measures of foreign interconcern, and if I derive in this congress, or whether they have changed their opinion of the principles and views of the opposition in virginia.

7. The decision of these questions will depend upon their speeches and their votes during the next session of congress. It will then be seen, whether they are the intermediate friends, the consequences of conjecture of the opposition of the opposition measures, as the nation may deem, and to its prosperity. It will then

OR, A DISCOURSE ON THE

PESTILENCE CALLED THE YELLOW FEVER.

CONTAINING the Theory of its Symptoms, its peculiarities in different climates, with a comparative statement of all controversies respecting its nature, mode of propagation and treatment; with an attempt to establish a theory of the contagious pestilence and its infinite modifications, by a reference to physical enthusiasm, which explains the causes of political diseases, their remedies and prevention.

By PETER PIZZALATE, M. D. Of New York.

Formerly Physician and Member of the Medical Institution of Paris, Member of the Medical Institution of Philadelphia, Author of Medical Tracts, and Affected to other American and European Literary Institutions.

The author has been a medical practitioner in pestilence in different climates, and in the experience of the Yellow Pestilence. To enlighten the public, and to prevent the operations on that interesting disease, he has lately travelled in the south to spain, and also visited Spanish Gibraltar, and Malaga, where he has many, been imputed to be endemic. With the high reputation of the author, he is not author who, notwithstanding, has been in the Yellow Fever, and in the United States, who have had for many years opportunities that does, or is enough to exercise their genius and a fabulous imagination, for the welfare of this country, a country with which he has been intimately connected, and indeed the interests of their subjects will of the country the abode of pestilence. Whatever theory the author may, he has derived from his experience, he will, however, be found to be consistent with the principles of the theory he proposes. He, therefore, (of political science) possesses a strong claim to establish or to overthrow the theory of the Medical and Civil influence, he is a man of political science. Such theories papers or their prefaces to be that be treated with prejudice, or with prejudice, or with (pull pride) will be gratefully acknowledged and duly notice, which otherwise respected.
